

As Alice Paul, Lucy Burns and their colleagues continue the suffragist fight, they encounter resistance. It isn't just men who disapprove of their efforts. Even some American women are not convinced the suffragists are right.

Despite the opposition, the suffragists are undaunted.

The parade—on March 13, 1913—is a very serious step forward in gathering much-needed publicity for the cause. Even Helen Keller attends the event:

But to the women, the event was very serious. Helen Keller "was so exhausted and unnerved by the experience in attempting to reach a grandstand . . . that she was unable to speak later at Continental hall [sic]." Two ambulances "came and went constantly for six hours, always impeded and at times actually opposed, so that doctor and driver literally had to fight their way to give succor to the injured."

One hundred marchers were taken to the local Emergency Hospital. Before the afternoon was over, Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, responding to a request from the chief of police, authorized the use of a troop of cavalry from nearby Fort Myer to help control the crowd.

Despite enormous difficulties, many of those in the parade completed the route. When the procession reached the Treasury Building, one hundred women and children presented an allegorical tableau written especially for the event to show "those ideals toward which both men and women have been struggling through the ages and toward which, in co-operation and equality, they will continue to strive."

The pageant began with "The Star Spangled Banner" and the commanding figure of Columbia dressed in national colors, emerging from the great columns at the top of the Treasury Building steps. Charity entered, her path strewn with rose petals. Liberty followed to the "Triumphal March" from "Aida" and a dove of peace was released.

In the final tableau, Columbia, surrounded by Justice, Charity, Liberty, Peace, and Hope, all in flowing robes and colorful scarves, with trumpets sounding, stood to watch the oncoming procession. The New York Times described the pageant as "one of the most impressively beautiful spectacles ever staged in this country." (See Sheridan Harvey's article, "Marching for the Vote: Remembering the Woman Suffrage Parade of 1913," online at the Library of Congress - American Memory - web site.)

Although the suffragists' parade is a "beautiful spectacle" for some, not everyone agrees with the goals of the sponsoring women.
