Once, not that long ago, America's capital had slave pens. Then known as Washington City, the place featured a line of sight between slave pens and the country's Capitol Building.

Washington was also a place where free blacks could be sold, as slaves, to pay for outstanding costs, like jail fees. A handbill, published in 1836, called the city "Slave Market of America."

In 1841, a black freeman named Solomon Northup passed through Washington City, on his way to slavery in the South. He did not walk through town along Pennsylvania Avenue, like so many other black people who marched there, single file, in slave coffles.

A violinist, among other things, Solomon had been duped by two white men who offered him the promise of employment with a circus.

Questions 2 Ponder

Why Were Slave Pens Allowed to Exist in America's Capital?

The buying-and-selling of people occurred near the U.S. Capitol Building, the place where U.S. legislators debated and passed laws impacting enslaved people.

Do you think that fact influenced, or did not influence, nineteenth-century American lawmakers who enacted laws such as the 1850 Fugitive Slave Act?

If legislators routinely saw Washington City slave pens, making them directly aware of the impact of slavery on people, what may have caused them to become hardened to the plight of such individuals?

How Do We Remain Hopeful When the Odds are Stacked against Us?

What does Northrup mean when he says: "The hope of rescue was the only light that cast a ray of comfort on my heart?"

What is it, about the human spirit, which helps us to be hopeful even when the odds are overwhelmingly stacked against us?
